Panelists Identify Future Challenges

Panelists discussed the future challenges facing the conference industry. They noted that the events of the last few years have created a "time of challenges, where there is more space than demand, which has created a situation where there is more supply, he said, creates a "buyer's market", with the events lasting longer and more time-consuming. These factors, combined with emerging new competition in the industry, mean that centres need to adapt and change to meet the needs of their customers. They emphasized the importance of flexibility and the ability to do business face-to-face is more important than their ability to do business online.

Practical strategies for coping with these challenges were discussed, including the need to "design for flexibility – because we are going to lose the information about them. As a result of these factors, alliances between centres and bureaus are more complex as well. The ability to measure results is also becoming more important, and that this could be the catalyst for bringing various different groups together. Finally, it was noted that bureaus tend to be membership organizations, which will serve me for the new Brussels Convention Centre."
